Editorial Review

From Booklist

Bolger recounts his two experiences commanding the 1st Battalion, 327th Infantry Regiment (part of the 101st Airborne) at the Joint Readiness Training Center, Fort Polk, Louisiana. There, the army's light-infantry units train against simulated guerrillas and other Third World types of opposition felt to be the most likely post-cold war opponents. As his comprehensive and enthralling narrative admits, he and his battalion were often embarrassed during their first session together but made improvements and returned for a second, more successful visit to the center. Describing that process, Bolger paints a warts-and-all picture of today's army, its strengths (the people in it) and its weaknesses (command staff and systems) as well as a detailed portrait, worthy of Tom Clancy in his nonfiction mode, of an airborne rifle battalion. If Bolger is as good a soldier as he is a writer, he may become the first four-star general to also win a Pulitzer Prize. Roland Green
